This profusely illustrated booklet describes the building stones used in the construction of St Augustine's Abbey in Canterbury. The abbey site itself provides an accessible and unparalleled opportunity to examine a range of medieval building stones representative of those used throughout East Kent and to be found further afield in South East England.

The booklet includes background information on the construction of the abbey walls with photographs, maps and a plan of the site showing the location of the stones illustrated. The descriptive information will provide a useful source of reference for archaeologists, geologists and those interested in vernacular Kentish stone buildings.

All proceeds will help to fund geological conservation in Kent
